IMO, the important factors to look at are the initial cost of the engine, what it will cost to install and get running well, the potential fuel economy, the potential power and how well the power curve of that engine will match the available gearing. I personally like all three engines. The following are just data points to consider.

The engine that is easiest to install is the AAZ engine code type. It is 1.9 liter and turbo charged like the TDI, but is not a TDI. Instead, it is the earlier generation and simpler "pre-chamber"-type with no electronic controls. This power plant puts out about the same torque (120 ft-lbs.) as a stock 2.1 liter waterboxer, but only about 75HP ...
